SPECTRE

OF INGLETON; OR THE

FOREST MYSTERY

By Christine H. Carpenter.

About the same time this conversation was taking place, Nelson Bradford was seated in his room, piring ever a heavy volume, which lay upon a table before him. The room was handsomely furnished with many be satisful paintings and engravit as lining the walls; a bookcase stood in one corter filled with volumes, whose gilt backs flashed, and gli tered, in the light like a mine of jewel-, and they were jewels of thought, the repository of the poble muds, and great geniuses of the world. Branford was fond of reading but . las! the gems of imagery, the well defined characters, the acquisition of learning did not talle away the secret villany of his cha racter, or 100 him of his love of pleasure, and

He arose ; ushed aside the one he was perusing and going to the cabinet, commenced reading the title of the numerous books, suddenly he exclaim-

Raich's trestise on poison!

He took it from the she f, and reared himself again at the table, he turned over the leaves, one by one, carefully looking at them; at length he pensed, and muttered :

"This suits me, this suits me ' one, two, three, four ingredients, beside the other trides. The title is good, to my purpose.

"This poison is slow but sure, twelve drops infused in a glass of water, or wine, are sufficient; enerating so as to give the victim, who has swallowed it, the appearance of having the consump sien. Is will produce death, one month from the zing it is token. The symptoms are a gradual wasting away, a spitting of bino!, and finally ends in dissolution—there is no antidote!"

"No antidote, better still. I'll try it. I'll have It ready in time of need : the articles are easy to chasin, the poison som made; to-morrow I'll do It then when epportunity offers, I'll use it Dend mer, and & ad women, for the matter o that, tell to takes."

He placed a slip of paper between the pages to designed the item. and closing the book, returned in to the cabit et.

"New " he continued, in low, deep tones, "I shall soon be safe. But can it to that I am pursted by a spectre? Yesternight, when the apperition presented itself at the window, though my heart custed with fear, even when it had disappeared. I dared not show it; even now, my They say the murdered hount the earth for a week after burfal, but I have reliculed all those rimen of the spectre."

He gated fearfully around the spartment, as if expecting to see it rise again to view. "Even ble, he put the remains into the kettle, lighting Julia was afraid, but, like my self, she concealed the lamp beneath it.

For the space of three hours he peced the spariment, and then going to the casement, he threw up the window, and looked out into the lawn below; he started back, terror stamped upon every feature. He dared not go back to the window to fasten it; at length, mattering. "What! am I such a coward? As ay with fear.

He slowly advanced to the casemen, but despits his efforts, his eyes seemed drawn by some magne ic influence to the lawn. There it was in the same place, that tall figure in the air revived him. long cleak, its orm out pretched toward him! "I have forgott Shuddering and alarmed, he nervously botted that his door was locked, he hastly prepared for

Sleep, however, seemed banished his pillow,

"Skep refused to wrap bim in her arms,
And left to memory sed the charm
To wake up visions of the gros past—

The dark deeds that fearful on his view
Girded swift, and fast."

CHAPTER VII.

"And tope, if less caperly sought, is less bitterly disappointed."—The Disawner "Those subtle poisons, which made science crime, and knowledge a temptation.—L. E. L.

"Lady, thy white brow is fair, Beauty's morning light is thine, And thine eye is live a star Beaming in the heavens afar." ETURL CHURCHILL.

Assembled in the library at Cranliffe Hall was Mrs. Cranliffe, Harry, Col. Pesting, Nelson Bradford, the village attorney, and a lawyer. It was evident some important event was on the tapis, from the appearance of the whole party. The attorney was a short, fat, bald-headed man, who seemed wonderfully impressed with the dignity of his office, and wished others to be fully aware of his importance, but, withal, a good hearted individual, who liked to see the right dealt out to all, as evenly as if weighed in "The cause of strife removed so rarely well,

"There, take, says Jussice, "take you each a shell.
We thrive at W-stminster on foos sike you "Tens a fat opater. Live in peace. Advan."

After two or three preliminary "ahems," he addressed them :

"My friends, you are well aware that I am now about to read the last will and testament of George Ctanliffe, deceased. I, therefore, require your attention, and will strive to occupy as brief a space of time as possible.

He untied the manuscript that lay before him, and proceeded to break the seal. After unfolding and straig htening it, he braced himself up, expanded his chest, and in pompous tones read the opening clauses; then followed: "I, George Cranlife, being this moment in full possession of my seems and health, do bequeath to my dear brother Harry all my estates, excepting Cranhiff-Hall and its surroundings; also, I do Cranhife Hall and its surroundings; also, I do give and bequeath unto him the bulk of my fortune, reserving the sum of five thousand dollars to pay all debts, &c., the remainder of it, after the above are deducted, to be given to my wife, heade which, I do give and bequeath her, the above excepted, Cranhife Hall and its adjuncts."

Here followed a number of other small affairs, to be cettled, and the will was read.

It would be impossible to describe the blank actonishment 'pictured upon the faces of Nelson Bradford and Julia Crapliffe, as they heard the preceding statement; for a few moments they were speechless. At length, the latter found "Is that all ?" "All, madam? Why, yes, madam. Is it not enough?" questioned the choleric attorney. Amazement possessed every faculty. Nelson rould not speak; the man was rooted to the spot. He had been so confident that the property wou'd all be Julia's, to find it all dashed to the

"Yet, thus it is with all! Like Summer flowers, each hope fador a way, That so long we chershind, With never once the thought...it might docay."

In her astorishment, Julia had not thought of him, but when she recollected herself, and turned her eye upon him, a gleam of triumph sparkled there, notwithstanding her heavy disappointment.

"He is foiled in his hopes," thought she. 'Tis another drop in the cup of revenge." Learing against the mantle stood Harry, gazing intently, first upon the latter, then up-on Bradford. The Colonel, who occupied an arm-chair beside hie, was likewise engaged. "By St. Antrim!" mused be, "this ge a surprise. Ha, he, my fine birds, you can squirm and twist, but it s 'no go.' " The wid lay upon the table, and the attorney was smoothing his chin with his hand, slience prevailing. At length, Julia glanced at Harry, encountering his gaze with one of these vague, dreamy looks she assumed at pleasure, then suffered her eyes to wander to the face of the Colone'. Though her countenance expressed not her purpose, she was striving to read the

After awhile she fastened her glance upon that of Bradford, he fel; her gaze, and the hot blood rushed to his cheeks and brow, at his rained expectations, and a voice seemed whispering in his ear-" Remember your oath-you hav sworn.

The attorney now broke the stillness, by exclaiming : " Friend, you can now depart if you wish it. Mr. Cranliffe"-he continued, turning to Harry-" I congratulate you upon the ac cession to your wealth."

"Yes, Harry, boy, said the Colonel. "By Christopher, you are a trump !"

"And you, Mrs. Crauliffe," resumed the atto "Fine estate, this Cranliffe Hall, good title, quite a fortune-at your service any time," and with a few more disconnected sentences, he took his leave.

Bradford had turned from the gaze of Julis to the window, where, by a mighty effort, he assumed his ordinary politeness and affability. "Harry." he exclaimed, taking his hand, "I must, as a friend, congratulate you. I am glad, for your sake, it is to."

"Thank you, Nelson, thank you. I appreciat your feelings, I assure you."

In a short time after, the hypocrite prepare to take his departure; in pressing Julia's hand, he felt a small bil'et s'ipped into his own, concealing it, be made his cong; he did not venture to ascertain its contents in the road, the incicent of the graveyard was as yet too vividly impressed upon his mind, but when once within the privacy of his room, he opened it.

NEISON. Remember your oath ! I am deceived, disappointed, but you will not desert me. Come to the Haft three nights bence. JULIA."

'My oath! that cursed oath! What tempted me to swear it? Ye gods, was over men so foiled? O, I had deemed the prize so secure, but I'll settle one matter-she still has Crantiffe Hall, that is something. 'Twill satisfy desire for a time. I'll now to the poison. All is

He threw off his cost, and proceeded toward the small table, occupying one corner of the room. Spread cut upon it were the broad leaves of some peculiar shrub; he gathered them up. and cut them in fine particles. There was also bined fractes at the idea of the dead walking. | a lamp, with a small kittle fitted in an iron rim, just above it; going to the book-case he brought forth two white papers, containing some powghest stories related to me, and laughed at them | der, and two vials, one filled with a liquid of a moreofing :: but my eyes and ears both bear | bright vermilion hue, the other a fluid of milky whiteness.

When he had made the leaves as fine as possi-

He then took a larger vial from the cabin and covered them with the contents, which were of inky blackness; soon they began to simmer, an almost imperceptible odor began slowly to fill might. his giance sought the beavens, where smiled the moon in queenly majesty, with her twinkling train of stars; his gaze fell to the air. The mixture in the kettle boiled, when he lifted it off and strained it into a small brass cup; he procured the book and opened it before himthe first part of his work was done. He next poured six drops of the vermilion fluid iato it; it was placed over the lamp sgain, suffered it to boil, when he added a few grains of the powder. A faintness stole over him, and, almost overcome, he hurried to the window-a draught of

"I have forgotten the mask!" he muttered and hastening to a small closet, he brought forth the shutters, and then, having satisfied himself | the article so indispensable to alchemists, fastening the transparent shield upon his face, he proceeded with his occupation, one by one he added the ingredients until the last was used, and clapping his hands upon the book, he exciaimed, "New, if it is only clear!"

He lifted the vessel from the lamp, and after permitting the preparation to cool, fitled a small vial with some of it, he held it toward the light, the glass mask was still upon his face, when the fastenings becoming lessened by accident, it slipped off and fell at his feet, shivering into

"I might have needed it again," he exclaimed, as he beheld the fragments, "but 'tis too late now, to grieve. At least, I have enough this time, I tit will fill two vials, each twenty-four drops, four doses. Ab, how clear it is, continued he, as he beheld the limpid fluid sparkle in the light, concentrating like a prism the rays of the sun. "The clearer the stronger, my work is done, here is safety. His eyes beamed with a sort o wild joy, as ouring the remainder of the poison into another bottle, he tightly sealed them, and placing them together with the treatise into the bookcase, he locked the doors. He soon cleared away all traces of his labor, dispensed with the lamp and kettle, then flung himself into a chair.

"The more I think of it, the more it puzzles me," he soliloquized, "I cannot see why George Cranliffe willed his principal wealth to his brother. Can it be that he doubted Julia? I think not, we were very cautious, and then she committed no really flagrant act. I have de-ceived one as well as the other! She, too, has been foiled. I love her not-bah! the thought of it sickens me; though I am compelled to make pretensions. I wish my secret had remained locked within my own breast, but that wo man cannot be resisted, she must be possessed with some magical art! How could mere guessing have come so near the truth? and then she questions me so sharply, and to the point!"

"I do not think she deceived me when she led me to believe that she was sure the property would be hers. I surmise she was as much amazed at the turn affairs have taken, as myself; and, for my part, I never doubted! I always thought he loved her so well. There's comething wrong, but I'll be safe. Yes, yes; I'd not run any risk. I'd be in security as soon as possible. Here, at least, is one place where that horrid spectre has not intruded; here I will defy it; I can the it here! I wish I could sleep at night, I am troubled with such horrid dreams; that form is ever present; but I will defy it! !!"

Three nights subsequent to this conversation,
Melson Bradford wended his way to Cran life
Hall. The night was cloudless, and as he strelled along, he forgot, for awhile, his dark fancies his thoughts were concentrated upon nothing it particular, roving hither and thither, devoid o the volition, of will, now upon the past, then upon the present, again in the misty obscurity of the future; he had neared the avenue tending to the house, when a loud voice sounded in his ear,

"Murderer !" With a loud shrick he fled, stopping not to see who it could be who thus disturbed him, cotous of nought save a fea ful inward revulsion of feeling.
He rushed into the hall, where he encountered Julia, who hurriedly asked the cause of the cry, for she had recognized his voice. "The spectre!" was all he could articulate, as she drew him into the room and closed the The artful woman trembled inwardly as si remembered the interruption of a previous evening, but she knew did she openly di play fear, ber power over him was gone; so, mastering her emo ion, she hissed-"And what did the spectre say that should righten you so?" To be Continued.
